EVENING.
BY J. G. PERCIVAL.
The evening star now sparkles bright; Full shines the rising moon;
And brightly shines the holy joy Around the horizon.
The bosom swells with holy joy;
The heart beats with holy joy;
No longer care and pain annoy; Unchecked the feelings flow.
The meadow brook now dances light;
Its waves shine silver clear;
The stars are dancing strangely bright, Along you azure sphere.
The nightingale her melody Trills lightly from the brake;
And trembling, bleats in harmony,
The moonbeam on the lake.
The heavenly maiden lingers long,
As trills the melody;
Her tender bosom feels it strong;
Her tears are flowing free.
She fondly thinks her lover true
In a serene night;
And sadly sweet in dreams again She sees him standing by.
Oh! evening is the time for me;
Be thine the garish day;
My spirit is so full and free,
As fades the light away.
My heart swells with holy joy;
My heart beats with holy joy;
And fondly, then, without annoy, My gentler feelings flow.

plume, and gay apparel, and a tall and bounding charger. There was war! Dissolution had overtaken the happy valley; the wretched vines were streaming and dead upon the ground; the once clear fountain is choked and stagnant, and Helena gone!
So our soldier turned his horse's head away, and led his men for an armed band were with him—to a crowded city. He found Helena there, and with her father, a great merchant, too, had wood here. Already her marriage was talked of, and now Gomez was ever near her, hovering round her like a watchful angel. Alas! one night, when she had consented to meet him, he was seized, bound, and borne to a dungeon.
Many weeks he was detained in his dark cell, and at last one came to release him. He looked at his liberator, and thought he knew his face—"And is it thou," said he, "my rival, that has generally come to my rescue? Tell me, I be-seach thee, of my love."
"She is not worthy of you," replied the youth, sternly.
He led him to a festival in the open air. There came by a gorgeous equipage, and therein sat pale, glittering with jewels, Helena, the daughter of the moonlight vineyard. So Gomez, turning to his companion, thanked him with grateful words for his generous services; he did not even ask how he had compassed his release; and then, with folded arms and glowing heart, he moved out of the crowded city, and, following as it were, the mere guidance of his feet, for his soul was dwelling on past happy times, he wandered on, till he found himself beyond the hum of men upon an open plain.

There floated toward him on the evening wind the sound of a concert-hall. There was peace in its tones, and, stepping onward with a more decided tread, he reached the gates, and asked admission. He took the vox, and then he found how terrible had been the rival's revenge. It was he who had told the merchant of Helena's escape from the dungeon. The merchant was a man of power, and Gomez was imprisoned. Once shut up, they told Helena he was false, and with a heart swelling with a woman's pride, she gave her hand to the crafty merchant.
Gomez was bowed to the ground with sorrow and despair. He prayed for strength. He schooled his passions, since his sacred calling demanded it; but he could not rest in the same country with his wife lost. In his youth, his solitary life—beyond his mother he had held communion with no one—had been devoted to study. Learning had not great charms for him; and now, in the spirit of a wide philosophy, he gave himself up to the subtle mysteries of science.
King Emanuel was fitting out his fleet—Men of genius were going to the East; and, obtaining permission from his superior, Father Ignacio, for this was the name he had assumed, requested to be admitted among them. I speak of upwards of three hundred years ago, when science, though in its infancy, made the most important discoveries.
The climate of the East, combined with the severity of his studies, began secretly to undermine the health of Father Ignac; and his friend Pimento, the king's admiral, persuaded him to take a voyage homeward. He gravely left his solutions, as he called his books; but many of the sick on board the admiral's ship demanded his care and counsel; this made the good father less loath to go. They set sail. Gentle winds wafted them through the Indian seas, and in a few weeks the face of heaven offhrew from their smiles—A tempest arose, and, lifting up their voices in despair, they cried aloud in their agony. All the good father offered up his prayers for all the tempest raged, and, lo! through the dark mist they saw a frightful rock. But Providence heard their cry for help, and, on the morning of the 11th of May, 1508, when the tempest had ceased to roar, though the sea still boiled and bubbled around them, and though their vessel, with spars all broken, and with shattered helm, reeled helplessly upon the waters, they lowered a boat and went ashore upon this barren and deserted island.

It was a day which to Father Ignac was fraught with sad and tender reminiscences. It was a festival of St. Helena, the anniversary of the day on which he had just beheld his beautiful and lost love dancing in the moonlight vineyard of the Andalusian valley, so he landed with his companions and they climbed the terrible rocks and finding much beauty in the interior which they had not expected from their first view of the island, they acceded to the good father's wishes that it should be named after the Saint, and they called it St. Helena. Many were sick, and when the ship had undergone repairs, they requested permission to be left behind. Father Ignac, consenting to become their pastor.
Discussions had meanwhile broken out among the Portuguese nobility in India. Some of them deserted to the native princes, and Albuquerque, having made them prisoners, punished them cruelly.

FRIAR'S VALLEY. A LEGEND OF ST. HELENA.

Long years ago, in the soft moonlight of a southern clime, a traveler looked down from a lone hill-side upon a valley that resounded with mirth and song. The voices of the young were borne up the side of the hill by fragrant breezes. There was an echo of gay dancing footsteps, and excited voices, with their swift and sharp beating, made the echo still more glad and perfect. Sitting then in shadow, and looking down upon the moonlit valley, the stranger said:—"Thus have I ever been, shut out from all companionship with my fellows, lonely, unknown, and utterly deserted, while they are gay."
Shall I tell you why he said this? His father was a Portuguese noble, his mother a poor Spanish girl. The noble had loved this poor Spanish girl, and though his country had called him back, he had still loved her. In his way with a fiery soul, for he would not marry her. But as his sister grew up, he watched him, had him educated, and now he told his mother that if she would and the youth to him, he would place him among the warriors of Portugal. She hesitated, she wept, she consented, then she retracted her consent; and her son, with that proud longing for distinction which leads young spirits forth to danger, left his home, and proceeded to Portugal. "It may be," said he, "that my deeds may lead my father to do my mother justice." Vain dependence on man's generosity!
He departed. And, wandering on, he rested by the road side, or in dark woods, or among mountains, or sometimes, as just now, upon a lone hillside. The moon increased in beauty, and, creeping down with slow and silent footfalls, her traveler descended among the lovely vineyards.
He remained in shadow; it was such enjoyment to stand under those green and fragrant vines of most delicious beauty; and, looking out from his hiding-place of tender leaves, he gazed till his heart beat heavily and mysteriously. A young girl was dancing, sometimes alone for a few minutes, and anon she struck her castanets, and a group of girls advanced, holding out their hands to young girls who followed them. The dance was slow, and the music solemn; and when it was done he heard the young girl who had led it rejoicing that the solemn dance was over. He saw them crowning her with flowers, and knew that she was the favorite of the night. Then for the first time he saw that beautiful dance, the Cachucha, and before she began she sang a symphony of harmonious words. "Chiva dol alma," "O my soul," sang a slender youth, who led the maiden out, and she began the dance, that lovely dance, the more beautiful, the more graceful, for through the dance, she bent the knee, and, throwing back her head to gaze on her young companions, she held her tiny instruments aloft, and beat them, as though challenging her girlish compeers.
Now peeping under her wretched arms with a sly smile, now flinging back her head in mimic sneering, then starting up, she moved gently backward with a deprecating air, and, smiling and breathless, and with a thrilling laugh, she ended with clasped hands and head bent bowed, replying nearly to their swift applause.
And he, the gazer hidden among the vines, saw the slender youth, who led her forward, approach to conduct her to a bench overhung with golden grapes, and he saw her turn aside from that youth's whispered words. Mournfully, and with a sense of deeper loneliness than ever, our stranger still sat, then, pausing with eyes bent one way, but his foot another, he broke his way through the overhanging vines, and stood forth in the moonlight among the group of joyous dancers.
He had emerged so quickly from the gloom into light, that a few uttered slight screams, and the young men sprang forward with brows bent on him angrily. Ere they could ask his mission, he had spoken. "I'm a stranger," said he, "weary, and wanting rest." His words were few his manner simple, his voice gentle, and he looked most wonderful. So they bade the stranger sit down among them, and bringing him grapes and clear water from a fountain that made sweet music in the vineyard, they desired him to rest himself. The youth's coming had made them pause, and the men looked half angry at the intrusion that had so stopped their mirth, while the damsels stood by and gave him welcome and refreshment.

There floated toward him on the evening wind
the sound of a concert-hall. There was peace in its tones, and, stepping onward with a more de-
sion. He took the vox, and then he found how
